Overview

This course provides an introduction to selected ethical problems associated with health and health care in Canada and more globally. For instance, how should we allocate resources to health care, as compared with other initiatives influencing our health at the population level (education, social services, preventive public health measures)? What is the character of morally appropriate therapeutic relationships? How should we regulate new reproductive technologies? What particular moral problems are associated with abortion, euthanasia, and research on human subjects? Students will become familiar with traditional ethical theories and some recent challenges to them. Through readings, cases, and written work, students will learn to consider applications of theoretical approaches to current moral dilemmas in health and health care, and will develop skills necessary to critically analyze new developments.

Outline

- Unit 1 Ethical Dimensions of Health and Health Care
- Unit 2 Ethical Theory and Moral Reasoning
- Unit 3 Resource Allocation
- Unit 4 Health Care Relationships
- Unit 5 Informed Consent
- Unit 6 Ethical Dimensions of Health Research on Humans
- Unit 7 Abortion
- Unit 8 Reproduction and Genetics
- Unit 9 Euthanasia
- Unit 10 Broadening the Agenda of Health Ethics

Learning outcomes

When you have completed Philosophy 335, you should be able to

1. effectively recognize those situations that require ethical judgment, with particular attention to those situations that are encountered by health-care professionals.
2. accurately identify and understand moral issues that are faced by health-care professionals.

3. develop and present arguments relevant to resolving these issues.
4. critique and defend ethical judgments and points of view related to these issues.
